RAEMER SCHREIBER

Oregon’s forgotten H-bomb connection

The Linfield and UO grad’s story is told in a new documentary film

Douglas Perry The Oregonian/OregonLive

Mike changed the world on a cool Saturday morning in 1952. The first-ever hydrogen bomb, known by its boy-next-door codename, offered up a blinding white flash when it detonated. The fireball — massive, shooting off piercing purple gamma rays — mutated into a mushroom cloud that quickly rose more than 25 miles over the South Pacific and would stretch out some 100 miles. Great chunks of radioactive mud tumbled like lemmings from the cloud’s canopy, crashing into the sea around Eniwetok Atoll. Admiring the sight from the deck of a Navy ship was a former Oregon farm boy, one of the key scientists who made it happen. SEE SCHREIBER, A10

Raemer Schreiber “was an American hero,” the maker of a documentary on him said. He “led an incredible life.”

A gunman killed four people and injured two children in a shooting rampage in Northern California’s Tehama County on Tuesday morning before he was fatally shot by law enforcement. And, according to police, it could have been much worse. The school: The gunman, who authorities have not identified, tried to get into rooms at an elementary school with the intent of shooting children but was thwarted because school officials had initiated a lockdown after hearing shots.

The victims: One of the people killed was a neighbor of the shooter, authorities say, who had taken out a restraining order against him. The scenes: The gunman, according to an assistant sheriff, opened fire “without provocation” in at least seven locations. What happened: Officials say the gunman shot a person, stole a pickup truck and went on a shooting rampage. After crashing the truck, the suspect hijacked a second vehicle and kept shooting people at random, including children. The gunman was involved in a domestic violence incident Monday, according to police. A9
